

Putting Your Children First: Considerations for Child-Focused Parents Who Are Approaching Divorce or Separation

- Remember, how the two of you conduct yourselves as parents will impact how your children adjust to the family changes as well as their current and future emotional well-being
- Manage conflict between parents
 - avoid arguing in front of the children
 - demonstrate respect
- Speak positively about the other parent or avoid making judgments about the other parent altogether
- Encourage your child's relationship with the other parent; your children want to have healthy relationships with both parents
- Be emotionally and physically present for your child
- Remain consistent as a parent through the family changes
 - maintain healthy previously established routines
 - continue to balance discipline and flexibility
- Be honest with your child but protect them from adult issues (use family, friends, or a counselor for this)
- Avoid placing blame toward anyone for the family changes (even if you think someone is to blame)
- Take care of yourself emotionally and physically; this will allow you to make healthy choices and decreases the risk your child will feel the need to take care of you
- Pay attention to your child and get them help if any significant concerns arise
- Consider working with a child specialist to support a positive child-centered process and healthy outcomes for your family

You can help your children emerge from this unsettling time feeling loved, confident, and strong.

Casey Holtz, PhD, LLC, Child and Family Specialist